Nan Jeffrey : Adventuring with children: The complete manual for family adventure travel before purchasing it in order to gage whether or not it would be worth my time, and all praised Adventuring with children: The complete manual for family adventure travel:

How many husbands and wives, no matter how resilient, haven't looked at each other after weeks of wrestling with the issue of The Family Vacation and concluded "not this year?" The pitfalls are too many, the variables unknown, and the anticipated rewards too few and far between. Adventuring with Children, Nan Jeffrey's manual for traveling with children to known and many unknown remote destinations, should give us all courage and confidence. It can be done. She has done it many times. And it can be done with reso-tinding success. Her book chimes with the pleasure and personal growth of shared experiences. Jeffrey maintains that "enjoying a trip is to a large degree dependent on how prepared you are even before you leave." And she prepares the reader well, with gentle do's and do not's, and with very helpful lists: what equipment the adults should take, what children's clothing to include, which of their toys, and how many books. She tells us what she has gleaned while camping, hiking, bicycling, sailing, and canoeing with children from young toddlers, even to teenagers on four continents. All of it is instructive. While the Jeffreys' idea of adventure travel may not be everyone's fantasy of what to do for your summer vacation, their beliefs of what can be experienced adventuring as a family are inspiring. -- From Independent Publisher
