Binka Le Breton : Voices from the Amazon (Kumarian Press Books for a World That Works) before purchasing it in order to gauge whether or not it would be worth my time, and all praised Voices from the Amazon (Kumarian Press Books for a World That Works):

3 of 3 people found the following review helpful. Brazilian peoples fighting to survive in the AMAZON By Sleeping Brewty This very readable and well researched book explains the daily struggles of the people who actually live in the rainforest: the Indians, the rubber tappers, the loggers, the ranchers, the miners, and the river people. The author traveled across the vast areas to talk with the forest people and hear their stories. This book is very moving because it offers a real insight into the lives of the people that are suffering them most from the destruction of the rainforest. That the forest peoples trusted Ms. Lebreton is wonderful, and the stories they share are truly fascinating. Kudos to LeBreton for making the somewhat dangerous trek across the country of Brazil so that readers could have an accurate and honest view of the problems that plague the area. 6 of 6 people found the following review helpful. Effective presentation of the views of ordinary people. By A Customer This book does a fine job of letting the ordinary men and women of Brazil speak for themselves. While it does not have the analytical or scholarly depth of some other books on the subject (e.g. Hecht Cockburn's "Fate of the Forest"), its strength comes from the author's ability to listen to the people she meets. For both the general public and college undergraduates, it is a handy accessible introduction to issues of environment development in Latin America. It definitely stimulated discussions in my course on Global Environmental History, it would work equally well in courses on Modern Latin America.

* Stories told by indigenous peoples of the Amazon, including Indians, rubber tappers, miners, loggers, and ranchers* Suggests social and political reforms that could sustain the lives of rain forest dwellers and the planet* Written by an activist who set out by bus, truck, boat, and on foot to live with rich and poor inhabitants of Brazil Follow Le Breton through one of the Earth's last great frontiers--the Brazilian Amazon--and meet the people whose voices have too seldom been heard. Voices from the Amazon reveals the complexity of daily life in remote forest settlements and gritty river towns, uncovering the truth about development in the Amazon.

From Publishers Weekly A concert pianist living in Brazil since 1989, Le Breton took a three-month trip through Brazil's region, interviewing a diverse group of inhabitants. Though this book lacks insight and power, it serves as a decent overview of the region and its conflicts. Traveling in the state of Rondonia, which had grown from 100,000 people in 1960 to one million in 1990, Le Breton first speaks to representatives of the decimated Indians, who are struggling to acquire autonomy, then to loggers, one of whom declares, "These forests were given to us by God to be used." The caboclos --forest people of mixed blood--are concerned with day-to-day survival, and independent miners, known as garimpeiros, scratch out a living. A state bureaucrat waxes optimistic about planned local development, rich ranchers protest potential land reform, and rubber tappers talk about setting up forest reserves to protect against ranchers clearing land. Le Breton concludes, somewhat wishfully, that the Brazilian government must reform to preserve the forests, improve infrastructure and invest in environmental education, and that creditor nations should consider debt relief for Brazil. Le Breton lets the people of the forest tell us their side of the story." ---About the Author Binka Le Breton lives on a rainforest farm, runs the Iracambi Rainforest Research Center (where her duties require her to check frequently on the state of the forest), lectures and broadcasts internationally on rainforest and human rights topics, is president of Amigos de Iracambi, and in her spare time writes books. If you want to find out more about any of the work that she does, or you would like her to come and give a lecture for your organization, you can contact Binka at: binka@iracambi.com.
